PROPORTION PIECE

An algorithmically generated gallery exhibiting algorithmically generated art.

PROPORTION PIECE (formerly ALGO/ART) is an ongoing open-source browser artwork by Adam Clement. Eight generative drawing systems explore the golden ratio through repeatable composition and five simulations of human-looking materials: marker, tissue and graphite, watercolour, oil paint and action painting.

The growing 3D gallery tower — an exhibition that gains a floor each day.

The work

The project asks: “How far can the golden ratio govern a composition while its marks remain visibly human?” The viewer can change seeds and controls, examine compositions, and export their own results. These are seeded JavaScript-generated drawings, not AI-image-model outputs.

The growing gallery

Every day, new studies are generated and a new floor is added to a walkable 3D tower. Visitors enter the building, travel between dated floors in a lift and explore galleries. A selection of portrait studies becomes sculptures. Golden-ratio relationships shape the gallery plan as well as the 2D compositions. The building is part of the artwork.

About the artist

Adam Clement is a UK-based computing educator and creative coder. His browser-based experiments bring programming, mathematical structures and drawing together. PROPORTION PIECE explores the tension between exact compositional rules and the appearance of imperfect human marks.
